Update Your Auto Rack Fleet

Over half of all new autos make their first long trip by train, riding in enclosed tri-level auto rack cars. In service with most major roads, they can be found in the staging areas of every auto assembly plant, as well as reloading with import cars for their return trip.

Fully assembled and ready for service, these models are complete with separately molded side ladders, factory-installed grab irons, RP-25 metal wheels and Proto MAX™ metal knuckle couplers.

PROUDLY ANNOUNCING

The Santa Fe El Capitan

The HI-LEVEL Train That's Fun For Everyone!

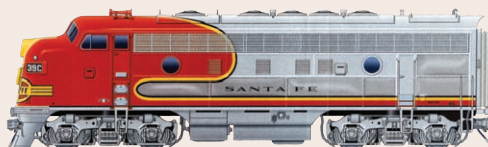

Santa Fe received its first experimental "Hi-Levels" for testing in July, 1954.

Passengers rode in reclining seats on the upper level, where large windows provided great views. The lower level housed vestibules, restrooms, diesel generator, air conditioners, brake gear and luggage racks. Tested on several trains, Hi-Levels soon proved immensely popular.

Santa Fe ordered 67 Hi-Level cars for five complete trains: ten 68-seat Step Down Coaches (one for each end of each train), 25 72-Seat Coaches, six Diners and six Lounges.

Standard cars handled headend work, but to smooth the transition between car types, baggage-dorms were fitted with a rooftop shroud and known as "transition cars."

Santa Fe took delivery of its first passenger F7s in 1949 when A-B-B-A sets arrived in September. Numbered 37LABC through 41LABC, they were designated the 37-Class. Many remained in service until the Amtrak era, and some were later rebuilt as part of Santa Fe's CF7 program.

EASY ETHANOL OPERATIONS

An ethanol plant adds interesting operational possibilities to your railroad. With plenty of inbound and outbound traffic, train action is constant—especially if you like prototypical switching and unit trains. To create a good traffic flow and allow enough room for freight cars, here are some prototype facts and planning suggestions for scaling down the rail activity to fit your HO layout.

Loads Move Both Ways

A prototype 100 million gallon per year plant (typical sizes range from 50 to 110 million gallons) gets about 28 cars per day, although many plants receive only about 60% of their corn by rail (17 cars) and the balance by truck. Tank cars of gasoline are received by the plant. During the process, 5% gasoline is added to denature the ethanol (make it unfit for drinking to avoid alcohol beverage taxes). This traffic amounts to one car for every 20 outbound ethanol cars, or about a car every other day. An ethanol plant ships out two major products, ethanol and dried distillers grains (DDG), a protein-rich byproduct used in animal feed. A 100 million gallon per year plant sends out 10 tank cars of ethanol and nine hoppers of DDG pellets per day.

Cutting it Down to Size

By now, you're probably thinking that's a lot of rail traffic. For most HO layouts, these numbers can be cut to a quarter. Inbound, five to seven cars of corn per operating session, plus a gasoline tank every third session is a good layout-sized traffic flow. Outbound, two or three ethanol tanks and two or three DDG cars every session is sufficient. Empties double the number of cars.

Support Trackage

To keep costs as low as possible, large plants try to receive corn and ship ethanol in full trainloads, so most facilities have a storage yard/loop or a few storage sidings. Single cars of gasoline and DDG (not usually the same cars as corn) also must be stored for loading and pickup. On your layout, the storage yard can be one siding long enough to hold the day's output, another to hold the input and one each for the loading/unloading shed and the tank car loading rack. See the track plan for a layout-sized example. If you're pressed for space, a wayfreight serving the plant can exchange empties for loads, eliminating the need for a storage yard. To facilitate switch moves and avoid fouling the mainline, a tail track allows all switching to occur on an in-plant track.

Switching the Plant

The plant switcher keeps busy shuttling loads and empties between storage tracks and loading/unloading facilities. At prototype plants, the switcher crew positions each hopper in the loading/unloading shed and the move is repeated until all cars are unloaded. The same moves are necessary for loading DDG. For ethanol loading, tank cars are positioned next to the loading rack and repositioned after loading is complete. Once the cars are loaded or unloaded, the plant switcher moves them to storage tracks for pickup by the railroad.

The North American Ethanol series includes all the structures you need to add an ethanol plant to your railroad.

Did You Know?

From the days of kerosene to modern high-intensity discharge bulbs, better lighting has been a must for driving after dark or in bad weather.

Over the years drivers have customized their cars and trucks with all kinds of after-market parts, including spotlights, yellow or white fog lamps, side and overhead marker lights, powerful off-road driving lights, even special neon tube lights mounted on the underframe!

A wide range of details is available to customize your models, and today's ultra small LEDs and electronics can add a new level of realistic lighting to many vehicles.
