"Walther's should be congratulated for finally getting the NYC two-tone grays right!"

Rich Stoving, Director, New York Central System Historical Society

"Based on actual paint samples in possession of NYCSHS members, the color of these new Walther's 1948 20th Century cars are nearly dead-on."

Did You Know?

Think of your layout as several scenes, connected by the railroad. Figures can tell visitors what's happening in each.

Look around and you'll find ideas you can duplicate. Parks come to life with kids playing, a band warming up, and older folks on benches. Parking lots outside of businesses tell different stories than those at factories. And of course, figures can do all sorts of jobs in residential areas from washing the car to hanging laundry.

Along the railroad, add seated figures outside the depot, an agent inside, and passengers on arriving trains. Track workers, hobos and more can also add action to scenes along your right-of-way.

Did You Know?

Got a tiny empty space in a rural area of your layout? You may have all you need for a cemetery scene.

Into the early 20th century, it was not uncommon for families to bury loved ones on the farm or close by. For some, their loss was simply too hard to bear, for others it was tradition, and in some cases, the nearest town or church burying ground was simply too far away.

Using various materials and tombstones, any small spot can be used. Some have become overgrown and neglected, so longer brush and weeds as well as broken stones and mature trees would be part of your model. Some are well maintained, and this can be modeled with short, mowed grass, trimmed bushes, fresh flowers and a fence. A figure or two working there would add to the realistic detail.

Did You Know?

Real wood has been used for modeling for centuries, but plastic may be a better choice for modeling wood as it resists humidity and is sturdier.

Wood grain can be added by pulling a fine-toothed razor saw over the surface of the plastic. Hold the saw at a slight angle to add variations.

Paint by blending various shades of white, gray and light brown, or simply finish with any color of plastic-compatible paint.
