Did You Know?

Streamlining became a household word in the 1930s, as railroads unveiled sleek new trains.

But new equipment was expensive, and some roads simply reworked what they already had. Many aging steamers got a quick facelift with simple sheet metal trim and colorful paint. Others received slightly more involved cosmetic changes such as rounded noses, shrouded boilers or running boards and "skyline" casings to hide domes.

Most of the changes were short-lived as the shrouding made it harder to service some key parts. And as diesels later took over and passenger service was dropped, the fancy steamers were retired and scrapped.
