Build a Big City Station

A major passenger terminal servicing more than one railroad was common in larger towns or cities where space was limited. And paired with a variety of streamliners, it's an ideal focal point for passenger operations on your railroad. Based on an American prototype, this timeless station can also serve modern-day Amtrak trains or heavyweights from the steam-era.

Find more train stations and passenger cars in this issue and at walthers.com.

Did You Know?

It takes more than engine crews to run a railroad!

If you model cabooses a seated figure in the cupola or bay window, adds realism in seconds.

In yards, a clerk outside the office checking cars will make an interesting scene.

Signal and track maintainers often work alone. Add a pickup or larger truck and an appropriate worker to finish the scene.

Did You Know?

Ties are the most common detail on any model railroad but real ones don't all look alike. With a little paint, you can customize them in minutes.

New wood ties will be dark and shiny but age to a warm gray. A thin wash of gray paint applied randomly makes this easy to model.

Steel spikes and tie plates on top of each tie rust and stain the wood as well. Molded details on track can be painted with a fine brush in colors from bright orange for new ones to dark brown for older ones. Thin your paint and apply a little to the tie to model the staining action.
